Choosing Colors For Your New Kitchen

Whether you're remodeling your "forever" home or building with the intent to sell, the design and style of the kitchen will be a huge factor in the project's success. According to a recent article from Woodworking Network, roughly 85% of purchases are based on color. While color trends come and go, there are some constants that you can refer to:

White paint. When it comes to painted cabinets, white is the undisputed champion. In our factory, our standard White and Icing paints account for 70% of painted boxes! If you search "white cabinets" on Houzz.com, you'll get over 1.4 million results.

A natural touch. Pops of bright colors are often seen in lighting, small appliances and decor items, but natural hues are an excellent choice for walls, flooring and furniture pieces. Whether painted or stained, an array of colors that reference the earth and sky will blend together and provide a soothing backdrop for more vivid accents.

Variety. With the popularity of white cabinets comes the desire to mix up the look. For many homeowners that means adding a second, often bold, paint color on the island. Another option is to use wood cabinets for the island—often in a premium species with a rich, warm stain. By using classic white on the main cabinetry, the island becomes an easy-to-change feature when your tastes change, or a buyer wants to personalize their new kitchen.

When in doubt, be sure to ask your kitchen designer for input on styles, colors and materials. Many designers are certified by the National Kitchen and Bath Association (NKBA), and stay up-to-date on the latest info and trends while earning continuing credits to maintain their CKD (Certified Kitchen Designer) status.

Wood grain. Over the last couple of years, we've seen an increase in the use of grey-toned and dark brown stains. Paired with light-colored walls, countertops and flooring, this high-contrast look is a great choice for smaller spaces, as it adds depth without feeling like a cave. Lighter stains that show off the unique characteristics of each species are also popular, especially with a higher-end wood or a rustic style.
